Field of the Invention This invention relates to a method for performing periodic secret code updates in a cryptographic communications system having first and second communicator nodes, and, more particularly, to an encryption scheme which employs pre-established secret keys and encryption algorithm that allows secret code updates to be made at any time and at any node without compromising the data integrity of the message and without any degradation in the speed of data transfer. 2. Description of the Prior Art Many cryptographic systems employ a secret algorithm which is utilized to convert a data message to an output message. The secret algorithm is not known to a third party and can only be deciphered by its intended recipient. Cryptographic systems may be utilized to protect confidential transmissions or to provide a secure login capability within an otherwise unprotected network system. In order to prevent a third party from deciphering the secret algorithm, the secret algorithm is frequently changed in order to provide a different secret code each time a message is encrypted. One well-known prior art encryption system utilizes a secret key. The keys are utilized by a sender to encrypt the data message using a selected secret algorithm, while the recipient is provided with a matching secret key to decrypt the data message. Prior art key distribution methods utilize an initialization phase, where a predetermined key is distributed to a set number of users, a login phase where the predetermined key is exchanged and verification of the key occurs, and a mutual authentication phase where a secret key is verified between the sender and the recipient. One type of prior art cryptographic system is a system having a plurality of nodes coupled to each other via an a communications medium. Examples of such systems are found in time-domain multiplexed (TDM) optical communications systems or in TDM pulse-code-modulated (PCM) systems. In general, communications systems, such as computers and data transmission systems, use a system where data messages are transferred among nodes of the system. Specifically, in TDM optical systems, nodes are typically interconnected via one or more optical lines, while in TDM PCM systems, nodes are typically interconnected via one or more time-domain multiplexed lines. Data messages are carried on the one or more lines between nodes as signals having one or more identifiable and distinguishable data portions, with the use of one or more data signals for each data message. Colonic mucosal freehand mucosectomy (FM) may be a useful adjunct in the treatment of the colorectal adenoma. The objectives were to investigate the long-term pathological effects of FM, and to use this procedure as an investigative tool to evaluate an animal model of colon cancer. Forty-two Wistar rats were allocated to three treatment groups; Group I--no freehand mucosal surgery (no FM) (n = 12); Group II--FM as a preoperative adjunct to polypectomy (n = 12); Group III--FM as an adjunct to segmental colonic resection (n = 18). All animals received 1% azoxymethane (AOM) (20 mg/kg body weight), every week for eight weeks. Animals were killed at week 51 after the first AOM injection. All animals in the freehand group demonstrated histologically-confirmed colonic mucosectomy. Group II had significantly increased (P = 0.05) numbers of hyperplastic glands compared to Group I. There was a trend towards an increased adenoma burden in Group III compared to Group II (P = 0.08). None of the animals in Group II developed an adenocarcinoma. The freehand mucosectomy did not significantly increase the adenoma burden. It may have an inhibitory effect on the development of adenomas, particularly at the freehand mucosal edges. The study suggests that this preoperative surgical adjunct may be a valuable technique to evaluate an animal model of colon cancer.Q: Trouble with a 3D object array using glGetUniformLocation I am currently working on a project that requires a program to load a cube into a matrix. 3e33713323
