The easiest and fastest way to compress /decompress/optimize your files. Compress/decompress/optimize image files, office documents, video and audio files etc. A breakdown of document formats supported on a particular machine is an important consideration in the development of such machines. Documents are now available in a wide range of formats, including many specialized formats as well as the classical office text, graphics and image formats. Accordingly, it is necessary to be able to convert from the native format on a particular machine to a format to which the computer system can readily process. Although the problem of converting from one format to another has been the subject of much debate, there are still many documents in use today that are formatted for a specific machine but cannot be accepted as input to a computer system from the normal input device. Data is often transferred from one machine to another by means of a printer. Unfortunately, most printers are not readily compatible with all of the data formats used in such documents. For example, many printers cannot accept, process or render in print the video data used for moving image graphics found in the so-called "video graphics" documents. Also, the output of many printers is not well suited for automated scanning and sorting processes. The problem is compounded by the fact that most input devices for reading or acquiring data do not easily provide information regarding the format of a document in the input data stream. The problem of converting from one format to another has presented problems not only in the use of printers, but other devices such as scanners and CD-ROMs, and even in the storage of documents for future conversion. These problems exist in all areas of information technology, but are particularly acute in the design of document reading and storage devices, because these are the systems in which the largest body of data exists. Thus, it is the document storage and/or document reading and processing devices that are most critical to the development of effective systems. As mentioned above, the document reading and storage devices cannot easily determine the format of the documents they are reading or storing. In the past, a device manufacturer has determined that a "multifunctional" device is capable of recognizing various formats in the documents it will read and store. However, this has required complicated electronic circuits and processing. One can thus readily imagine that, at a time when a substantial portion of data is stored in a non-electronic format, the cost of sophisticated electronics and their complexity is not a problem.
