"After he made his statement, there were a lot of people in our cafeteria, and I saw somebody approach him and ask him to come talk to her," Cassel said. "It was a lady, and he said 'no, because I won't talk to her.' He kind of left it at that." Cassel said it wasn't until after the altercation that she spoke to police. She said she didn't think the altercation warranted the need for criminal charges. "I still don't think he should be charged with anything," she said. "He was just defending himself." But Newnan Police Chief Karl Eastin said his officers could have handled the situation differently. He said the officer should not have turned his back on the woman who approached him, rather he should have spoken to her. "My officers were in shock that he would step away from a woman," Eastin said
